John Carlesten, Jr., a young jazz hound, who does not understand his wealthy father any better than his father understands him, is sent out to the parental ranch to make good or go broke. Here he is put through a course of sports by the ranch foreman and falls in love with pretty Beryl King, between whose father and his own a feud has existed for many years, old man King still limping from old man Carlesten's bullet in his leg.

Contrary to King's orders, young Carlesten takes a short cut across the King ranch and is assaulted by King's cowpunchers in a corral but earns Beryl's regard by fighting like a tiger and whipping the biggest of them.

A few days later, he kidnaps Beryl and putting her into a racing motor car, whirls through King's ranch a couple of times scaring her into consenting to their marriage. He finally departs in a cloud of dust for the minister's house.

In the meantime, his father has heard good reports of him and meets old man King on the road as his son and King's daughter go hurtling by--whereupon the two old boys shake hands and forget their quarrel.
